

“No one has ever said that the women of Newmarket ever fail to provide refreshments for public occasions.”

Around 1840, just a year before the first passenger train pulled into town, Benjamin Mathes built a stone store at Tenney’s Corner. Fifteen Mathes family members are listed on the original deed. Sisters Maud and Mabel opened a millinery shop to keep the local ladies in the height of fashion, Constantine Blodgett Mathes would later start a grocery and dry goods store, and the building we now know as the Riverworks would stay in the Mathes family throughout the 19th Century.

In the 20th Century, two generations of Kents went on to own 164 Main Street, where True Smith’s tinshop made hardware that peddlers on horse-drawn wagons would sell throughout the countryside. Two successive shoe repair shops then operated where our kitchen exists today, the Newmarket Telephone Company set up shop in the dining room, and the Mathes store in the tavern went from Marelli’s to Zocchiss’ to Malo’s, then Loiselle’s and finally Caswell’s Grocery by the mid-1950s.

The coming decades would bring some hardship to Newmarket (and some establishments of questionable repute to the old stone store) and townspeople would witness the last run of the Boston & Maine passenger train. But the years would also bring the Riverworks to town.

Today the whistle of a passenger train is heard again in Newmarket, and the gundalows – once maritime champions of the Piscataqua region – are long gone. Gone is the “rope walk” behind the building, where for untold generations men paced out lengths of rope, twisting together the very cords that would bind sails to our boats of transport and ships of revolution. And long gone are William Tenney, and before him Widow Mead, who once lived on this site, in a small house at the foot of a great ledge. But today, a building born with the railroad still bears its name in honor of the era it saw out.

Rope, sail, and legend. Stone, brick, and wood. Families, friends, and stories. Welcome to the Riverworks, Newmarket’s living room. We’re glad to be here, so we hope that you are, too.
